“Redistricting with Endogenous Candidates”

I study partisan gerrymandering when district composition affects candidates’ policy positions and, consequently, voters’ behavior. To do so, I embed a two-stage model of elections at the district level into an optimal redistricting problem. I show how traditional redistricting can backfire when voters favor extreme candidates in primary elections. However, sophisticated redistricting parties can leverage this dynamic and make gerrymandering an even more potent tool than previously thought. Using optimal transport theory, I characterize the optimal redistricting plan: create districts that drive ideological wedges between opponents, fostering extremism in primaries and turning voter diversity into electoral weakness. I use my results to investigate the impact of gerrymandering on polarization in the U.S. House of Representatives. By fostering the emergence of extreme opponents, gerrymandering creates an ideological gap in the distribution of district representatives.
